Chapter 1 by Jack Frost

Aaron swung the door open, letting it slam against the wall, as he didn't bother to close it. His feet hit the dirt ground hard and fast as he began to run. The sun was at its highest point in the sky as it beat down upon his back and on his back he carried a pack. It was full of the things that he thought he would need for this. He glanced back to see his dad run out of the house after him.

“Aaron!!” His father shouted, “What in the world are you doing?”

Skidding to a halt, Aaron turned to face his dad, saying, “I’m going to find mom whether you like it or not! I’ve been dwelling in lies for the past ten years because of you! You said that she had died when I was six but now I know for a fact that what you told me isn’t true and I’m going to go find her if it’s the last thing I do!” With that, he turned around before his father could reach him and ran once more, going faster than before, not caring that they were miles from any town as he ran through his wheat field towards mountains.

When he finally slowed, Aaron was at the base of the mountain, wind whipping his unkempt black hair into his face. He gazed up at the massive heights and then forward into the tree line
